

For the sake of honest politics in which all of society can maintain faith, David Cameron should keep his promise to fully implement Mr Justice Leveson's recommendations. Politics is currently in disgrace. Jeremy Hunt, when he was Culture Secretary, almost blew it when he claimed not to know his Special Advisor was talking to senior News International executives. Every member of the electorate was aware that Hunt knew full well what was going on and that deferring to Rupert Murdoch's wishes on Leveson was a part payment for the editorial support his newspapers were giving to the Conservative Party.

As a direct result of such actions, the credibility and honesty of politics is brought into disrepute and young members of society simply cannot engage in the democratic process.

For the sake of our future democracy, David Cameron, who made a promise should simply honour his pledge and keep it. We will all be better off if he does this.
